Harriet Ross Tubman  1822-1913  Dorchester County
Born in Maryland, Tubman escaped enslavement in 1849 and worked in Philadelphia as a domestic. Earning the name “Moses,” she orchestrated 13 rescue missions back into Maryland to liberate enslaved people. At risk of arrest, she spoke out against enslavement and in favor of women’s rights. Tubman embodied the conflict of being both black and female. These were both marginalized groups. She championed the activism of black women leaders in response to racism they encountered in the white National Woman’s Suffrage Association, of which she was a member.

Mary Bartlett Dixon Cullen 1873-1957 Talbot County
Born in Baltimore, Dixon graduated from the Johns Hopkins School of Nursing. Believing that women’s suffrage could not be separated from the nursing profession, she fought for women’s union and collective bargaining rights. As a field secretary for the Just Government League, she fought for women to receive officer rank. Dixon was arrested for picketing the White House and sent to the Occoquan Workhouse. After marrying and moving near Easton, she continued to be a leader, founding the Talbot County League of Women Voters and helping establish the Easton Memorial Hospital.

Nannie V. Melvin 1865-1942 Caroline County
Melvin expanded the Just Government League’s reach across the Chesapeake Bay to Maryland’s Eastern Shore. She traveled by boat from Baltimore and up the Shore’s scenic rivers to reach small towns. On the way, she polled fellow passengers on their pro- and anti-suffrage views. She established suffrage clubs from Cambridge to Elkton, welcoming rural women to the movement. As a field secretary, Melvin established the League’s office in Denton, her hometown. In 1911, she founded the Just Government League of Caroline County.

Margaret Boone Moss 1868-1942 Anne Arundel County
The April 1, 1916 Maryland Suffrage News featured Moss on its cover and described her as “one of the most energetic and popular suffragists in the State.” Boone’s interest in women’s issues was already emerging while she attended the Baltimore Women’s College in the mid-1880s. She wrote her senior thesis on heroic women. After graduation from the State Normal School in 1886, Moss worked as an Anne Arundel County teacher. She belonged to numerous organizations that supported children, women’s suffrage and education.

Wilhelmina von Stosch Nichols 1871-1954 Anne Arundel County
The daughter of a count, von Stosch was born in Washington, D.C. She became a painter and married the well-known artist Henry Hobart Nichols. Both were featured in exhibits around D.C. Her artwork is included in Doris Weatherford’s Women in American Politics: History and Milestones (2012). At some point, she moved to Anne Arundel County, participating in collective organizing and representing the county on suffrage and other conventions and events.

Alice Coale Simpers 1843-1920 Cecil County
Simpers attended warings’ Friends’ School near Colora, Maryland. She qualified as a teacher at Baltimore’s State Normal School. Simpers advocated for women’s suffrage with letters, essays, stories and poems for publications such as the Cecil Whig, New York Sunday Mercury and the Women’s Journal. At the 1899 Maryland State Suffrage Association’s Baltimore convention, she called for a vote in a speech called “First in War, First in Peace, First in the Hearts of (Her) Countrymen, but Last at the Ballot Box.”

Lola Carson (LC) Trax 1885-1962 Talbot County
Born in Easton, Trax was a Baltimore City suffrage and union activist. As a field secretary for the Just Government League, she was part of a committee to organize Washington County and laid the groundwork for the registered voter league. As an organizer for the Women’s Trade Union League, she went to Cecil County, an area with many canning workers, to explain the need for collective bargaining and suffrage to 600 people gathered around a soap box. Back in Baltimore, she made a “sitting suffrage appeal” to 700 striking men and women.

Valiant Maryland Women: The Fight for Suffrage
Eastern Shore and Anne Arundel County
Mary Bartlett Dixon Cullen 1873-1957 Talbot County
Born in Baltimore, Dixon graduated from the Johns Hopkins School of Nursing. Believing that women’s suffrage could not be separated from the nursing profession, she fought for women’s union and collective bargaining rights. As a field secretary for the Just Government League, she fought for women to receive officer rank. Dixon was arrested for picketing the White House and sent to the Occoquan Workhouse. After marrying and moving near Easton, she continued to be a leader, founding the Talbot County League of Women Voters and helping establish the Easton Memorial Hospital.